

Will my first-year WRI class be similar to my high school English class?

If you took a class where the focus was on student writing and the writing process, then yes, your first-year WRI class may be similar in many ways. If your high school English class focused on literary analysis, then no, your first-year WRI class will not be very similar. For instance, AP English Language and Composition and IB Language A: Language and Composition or another writing-focused class may be somewhat similar to WRI 109/110 and WRI 111; Classes like Honors World Literature, AP Literature and Composition or IB Language A: Literature will be more similar to an English class at WFU, like ENG 150, for instance. Instead of focusing on analyzing literature (like novels, plays, or poems) like you would in an English literature class, WRI 109/110 and 111 focus on your development as writer in ways that are meant to help you in all your classes at WFU. The English department offers excellent courses in literature, and you should check them out!

